CONGRESSMAN DESPAIRS OF EDUCATING INDIAN GIRLS TO MODERN KITCHENS

Tells How Longing for the Woods and Wigwams Overcomes Good Domestic Servants.

La Crosse, Wis., March 29.—That the United States government has not solved the problem of domesticating the Indian woman is the view of Congressman Esch.

Congressman Esch has been for years an ardent advocate of the rights of the redman, and has employed young Indian women in his household. He cited his experience with Florence White, Carlisle graduate, who has just received $2,800 from sales of forty acres allotted to her in Nebraska.

"Ten years ago," said the congressman, "I engaged Florence as a servant in my house. She was 17, had already graduated from Carlisle, spoke and wrote perfect English and had taken a course in domestic science at the Tomah Indian school. She was and is the brightest Indian woman I ever met.

"Florence was the second Indian girl we had at our house. The first remained only a few weeks and one day quietly left to go back to the tepee and the woods. When Florence came we concluded we had a jewel. She was nicely dressed, cleanly, capable and beloved by the children. She did her work thoroughly and well.

"Florence seemed to be perfectly contented for two or three months. Then one day her father came to the door and visited with her a few minutes. A few weeks passed and her brother came and had a chat. Then a strange young Winnebago man made a formal call. The visits of male relatives and friends became more frequent.

"Florence began to go around with a sort of wistful, faraway look in her eyes. It was the longing for woods and wigwams and it finally overcame her. Five months after she came to our house she packed her belongings and went back to the woods and the primitive Indian camp.

"The next time I saw Florence, she had married, wore moccasins and a blanket and had two papooses. I met her on a train near Valley Junction. She still spoke perfect English, looked healthy and contented, but she was the typical camp Indian woman."
